Not illustrated. 1898 Excerpt: ... towards accounting for the tenacity with which human admiration has preserved these little poems. It will be hardly necessary to add that their Omara author was no Atheist, not even an Agnostic. His rebellious addresses to the Deity, even when most audacious, are blasphemy those of a convinced believer; sometimes offering the advice of an intrepid subject to his sovereign, sometimes throwing out the shrewd comments of a court jester; always recognizing supremacy, often implying goodness. But let us hear:--If I go right, Thy guiding hand is--Where? If I go darkling, Thy clear-light is--Where? Dost Thou give Heaven for my obedience? T is due; but Thy benevolence is--Where? The impress of His hand the vessels keep, Who makes and throws them on the rubbish heap, But if they turn out well why are they broken? If ill, the blame is surely His to reap. He makes Earth bear the firmamental thrust,. He scars our hearts with sorrow, fear and lust, And many a ruby lip and perfumed lock Garners in clay and coffers in the dust. When shame for sin committed stirs the heart, Hot from the breast the scalding eye-drops start And surely when the slave laments his fault Complete forgiveness is the masters part. I drink, and every wise man does like me, Which God, no doubt, regards indulgently--Foreseen before the making of the world, If I did not, where would His prescience be? To keep from what is ordered beats our skill, Bid and forbid are masters of our will; Helpless we stand between their Yea and Nay, Like guests advised to tilt, but not to spill. Thou settest in my pathway snare and gin, Saying,-- I slay thee if thou fall therein, The world is free from Thy command no jot, Thine the command, but mine is still...
